Session I

10:45 – 12:00	Environmental decision making in a federal and inter-state context
	Although it is widely accepted that a greater diffusion of regulatory control through various levels of government – national, state, local, especially on issues of sustainable development is essential, experiences with natural resources show that States are often not as involved in decision making. Availability of natural resources is not uniform across states. Neither are the capacity and response the same. However, many environmental impacts are not restricted by political boundaries and affect the environments in other states as well. States may compete with each other for access and utilisation of trans-boundary and shared resources. In this context, this session would also discuss the role of institutions and coordination across centre, state and local levels.

Session II

12:00 – 13:30	Fiscal Matters in Green Federalism
	Chair: Atul Sarma, Member, Thirteenth Finance Commission
	The issue of revenue and transfers is an important thread in any discussion on federalism and becomes vital in the discussion on environment and natural resources. Given the different fiscal needs and capacities that states have with respect to providing environmental services, this session would reflect upon the fiscal matters involved in environmental federalism.
